Program Notes

In 1967, the major motion picture In the Heat of the Night opened in movie theatres across the country, and audiences watched with mouths agape as a forty-two year old Sidney Poitier made history on the silver screen. The film, based on John Ball’s 1965 novel of the same name, was one of the first to address serious issues facing our nation during the height of the 1960s Civil Rights Movement. It dealt head-on with the one thing that was on every American’s mind during that time: race.

The Civil Rights Act had been signed into effect three years prior to the film’s release, marking the end of segregation in schools, restaurants, bathrooms, businesses, and public transportation. But despite these legal changes, discrimination and mistrust between races in America was at a boiling point. Many white people resisted integration—and they rose up, violently, in protest. Other white Americans followed the non-violent teachings of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., supporting the de-segregation and fair treatment of their African-American brothers.

In the Heat of the Night gave a voice to the thoughts and feelings of those white Civil Rights supporters and to black people across America, who often kept their opinions hidden in fear of the power wielded by those in opposition.

Audiences who saw Heat in their local movie theatres had never before seen a character like the protagonist Virgil Tibbs (played by Sidney Poitier in the film). College-educated, well dressed, a respected police officer from California, and a black man, ‘Virgil’ was a product of the Civil Rights Movement who may never have been written into existence were it not for the efforts of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and his non-violent movement for racial equality.

Argo, Alabama, where the story of Heat takes place, is a fictional town, but the white townspeople’s hesitant feelings towards Virgil saturated many American cities during the 1960s, especially in the South. Violent discrimination against African-Americans—including church bombings, police brutality, riots—occurred all too frequently. The most horrific source of this racial aggression was the Ku Klux Klan. Just as in Heat, KKK members were often respected members of the community—policeman, mayors—who got away scott-free with terrifying acts of racial violence.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated on April 4, 1968—just six days before In the Heat of the Night was awarded five Oscars at the 1968 Academy Awards Ceremony. The story of In the Heat of the Night reached virtually every American in some form or another during the 60s and 70s. The film was later adapted into an award-winning television series that ran for seven seasons.

Over the past half century, we’ve made progress. But today, undertones of racial inequality and discrimination saturate American media and culture. There are moments in this story that are uncomfortably familiar to us today. And in many ways, In the Heat of the Night seems more timely than ever.
